A. adj.

1. Essentially different or diverse in kind; dissimilar, unlike, distinct. In Logic, used of things or concepts having no obvious common ground or genus in which they are correlated. Hence distinguished from contrary, since contrary things are at least correlated in pairs, e.g. good and bad. Also distinguished from disjunct, since disjunct concepts may all be redneed to a common kind.

Disparātus appears first in Cicero De Inv. Rhet. 28. 42, applied to the mere separation expressed by sapere, non sapere: A is not B, as against the opposition of hot and cold, life and death; it is used by Boethius, De Syll Hyp. (ed. Bas.) 608, to denote things which are only different, without any conflict of contrariety (tantum diversa, nulla contrarietate pugnantia). It reappears in 14–15th c. with the school of Occam, e. g. in Rud. Strodus and Paulus Venetus, and is retained in modern transformations of the scholastic logic. According to Ueberweg Logic § 53, disparate conceptions are those which do not fall within the extent of the same higher, or at least of the same next higher conception. (Prof. W. Wallace.)

(1860) I. 224 Notions co-ordinated in the whole of comprehension, are, in respect of the discriminating characters, different without any similarity. They are thus, pro tanto, absolutely different; and, accordingly, in propriety are called Disparate Notions, (notiones disparatæ). On the other hand, notions co-ordinated in the quantity or whole of extension .. are only relatively different (or diverse); and, in logical language, are properly called Disjunct or Discrete Notions. 1865 GROTE Plato I. vi. 249 Other creeds, disparate or discordant. 1883 F. HARRISON in Pall Mall G. 3 Nov. 1/2 The questions are so utterly disparate as not to be reducible to the same argument.

Dispatch, despatch (dispæ·tʃ), v. Also 6 dispach(e, dyspach(e, -patch; 8-9 despatch. [Found early in 16th c.: ad. It. dispacciare 'to dispatch, to hasten, to speed, to rid away any worke' (Florio), or Sp. despachar to expedite, 'to dispatch, to rid out of the way' (Minsheu). The radical is the same as in It. impacciare to entangle, hinder, stop, prevent, Sp., Pg. empachar to impede, embarrass. Not related to F. dépêcher, which gave the Engl. depesshe, DEPEACH, common in 15–16th c., rare after 1600, and app. superseded by dispatch before 1650. The uniform English spelling from the first introduction of the word to the early part of the 19th c. was with dis-; but in Johnson's Dictionary the word was somehow entered under des- (although Johnson himself always wrote dispatch, which is also the spelling of all the authors cited by him); though this has, since c 1820, introduced diversity into current usage, dispatch is to be preferred, as at once historical, and in accordance with English analogy; for even if this word had begun in ME. with a form in des- from OF. (which it did not), it would regularly have been spelt dis- by 1500: see DES-, DIS- prefixes.

The notions of impede, expedite, are expressed by different roots in the northern and southern Romanic langs. The radical of F. empêcher, dépêcher (Eng. IMPEACH, DEPEACH), OF. empeechier, despeechier, is taken to be a L. pedicare* (extended form of im-, ex-pedire, or deriv. of pedica 'fetter, gin'); cf. prêcher, PREACH, OF. preechier:—L. prædicare. This also occurs in Pr. empedegar. But Sp. empachar, despachar, Pr. empaitar, point to a L. type -pactare (f. pactus, 'fastened, fixed, fast', pa. pple. of pangĕre). The radical of It. im-, dis-pacciare, Pr. empachar (with which perh. are to be taken dial. OF. empachier, ampanchier, dapanchier: see Godef.), have been referred to a cognate L. type -pactiare (cf., for the phonology, It. tracciare, doccia're, succiare:—tractiare*, ductiare*, suctiare*). Thus, these words are quite distinct from F. empêcher, dépêcher, in 16th c. also despecher, which gave Eng. impeach, and depeach, also despeche, in Caxton depesshe, Sc. depesche. Dispatch, therefore, could not be of French origin. The date of our first quot., 1517, is early for a word from Italian, and still more so for a word from Spanish; but the active intercourse with the Papal Court and with Spain at that date may have facilitated the introduction of dispatch as a diplomatic word. Tunstall, our first authority for dispach(e, was Commissioner to Spain in 1516 and 1517.]

II. The action of administering, ordering, or managing; the system by which things are administered.

[This group of senses originates in the L. use of dispensātio to render Gr. οἰκονομία in N. T. and patristic writers. The latter is used in 1 Cor. ix. 17, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below); but in Eph. i. 10, iii. 9, for 'a method or system of administration' (specifically that which involved the Incarnation). From this latter arose various theological uses: (1) Tertullian (Adv. Praxean ii, iii, iv.) uses dispensatio = οἰκονομία to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i. e. a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes. This is known as an œconomical as distinguished from an essential Trinity: in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATORY, and essential.) (2) It was applied to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumpti corporis, d. susceptæ carnis, or simply dispensatio) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August. Serm. 264 § 5). (3) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratiæ in opposition to the Law or system of works (August. Ep. 82 § 20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salutis nostræ (August. Serm. 237 § 1). Hence, in the Latin version of Irenæus, Christ is called dispensator paternæ gratiæ (iv. 20. 7). (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertull. Adv. Marc. vi. 18, Hilar. Pict. De Trin. ix. 66, xi. 13); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption.]

An extension of the patristic use of the word as applied to the evangelical system based on the Incarnation (see note under II above); the patriarchal and Mosaic 'dispensations' being conceived as prophetic of the Christian, all being one in substance though differing in form. This use became common in the theology of the 17th c.

II. from med.L. dispensāre in eccles. use.

[In later med.L. (by 1200 or earlier) dispensāre was used absol. or intrans. (= agere dispensatorie or dispensative), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (οἰκονόμος), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively,' especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which, according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons; thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc. The chief constructions were dispensare in tali casu, circa jus, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp. cum aliquo (ut possit), etc. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc.). (Prof. F. W. Maitland, LL.D.)

These intrans. uses passed into English, esp. dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sense: see branch III. By elision of the preposition or other processes, the verb has also become trans. in the sense 'to grant dispensation to, for, or from.' Transitive senses are found also in French from 15th c.]

Others have used it in the wider etymological sense of direct separation of elements by any force, and applied THERMOLYSIS to dissociation by heat, as distinguished from ELECTROLYSIS or decomposition by electricity.

3. The action of converting any substance or constituent of a substance into vapour by means of heat, and of again condensing this by refrigeration into the liquid form, by means of an alembic, retort and receiver, or a still and refrigeratory; the extraction of the spirit, essence, or essential oil of any substance by the evaporation and condensation of its liquid solution; and, in a more generalized sense, the operation of separating by means of fire, and in closed vessels, the volatile parts of any substance from the fixed parts, in order to the collection of the products.

As shown by the etymology, the original application is to substances of which the distillates are condensed drop by drop into the liquid form; whether for the purpose of extracting the more volatile part of a substance, or of concentrating or purifying a volatile substance such as water by freeing it from matter held in suspension or solution. When no more heat is applied than just suffices to cause the liquid to pass over in drops, the process is called cold distillation. Dry or destructive distillation, the decomposition of a substance by strong heat in a retort, and the collection of the volatile matters evolved, as in the destructive distillation of coal in gas-making. Fractional distillation, the separation of two or more volatile liquids having different boiling-points, so that they pass over at different temperatures and can be collected separately, the more volatile first, and the less volatile in order afterwards. Distillation by descent (per descensum), in Old Chem., the name given to a method in which the fire was applied above, and the distillate drawn off beneath (see DESCENT 1 d). In opposition to this, the ordinary method was called distillation by ascent (per ascensum).

4. Logic. †a. In the earlier English writers used for what is now called Division, i.e. the logical division of a genus (a logical whole) into the several species included under it; less properly, the partition of a whole into the integral or constituent parts contained in it. Obs.

1588 Fraunce Lawiers Log. I. xiii. 56 b, A distribution is when the whole is distributed into his partes. 1628 T. Spencer Logick 143 When we say, a man hath two parts, soule and bodie: Living Creatures are reasonable, and vnreasonable, then we make a distribution. 1698 Norris Pract. Disc. (1707) IV. 194 Then he would have given us a full distribution of Immorality, to which all the instances of it might be reduced. 1725 Watts Logic I. vi. § 10 The word distribution is most properly used, when we distinguish an universal whole into several kinds of species.

b. More recently, after Scholastic usage of Latin distribuere, distributio: The application of a term to each and all of the several individual instances included in its denotation or extension; the acceptation of a term in a general sense including every individual to which it is applicable.

Said of a term qualified explicitly or implicitly by such marks of universality (signa universalia) as all, each, every, any, etc.; the one simple common term being treated as 'distributed' over all its significates; e. g. in every man, the term man is spread out over, or dispersed among, this, that, and every other individual man.

This use of distributio (which turns on the question discussed in Plato, Parm. 130 seqq.), first appears in the Schoolmen of the 13th cent., as Shyreswod, and especially Petrus Hispanus (1226-1277), of whose Summulæ the 7th chapter deals with the properties of terms, including Distribution, as an appendix to the exposition of the Organon, and with special reference to the solution of sophisms. The term apparently came into English logic through the medium of Aldrich: see Distribute v. 6.

(The speculation in Latham's Johnson s. v. Distributed is wholly gratuitous, and ignores the history of the word.)

[c 1250 Petrus Hisp. Summulæ vii. 5. 1 Distributio est multiplicatio termini communis per signum universale facta, ut cum dicitur 'omnis homo', iste terminus 'homo' distribuitur sive confunditur pro quolibet suo inferiori.] 1827 Whately Logic I. § 3 'All food', or every kind of food, are expressions which imply the distribution of the term 'food'; 'some food' would imply its non-distribution. 1849 Mansel Aldrich's Logicæ iii. § 3. 4 note, Distribution is not an Aristotelian term. It forms part of what the Schoolmen call parva logicalia; a kind of appendix to analyses of the Organon; containing matters, some evolved from .. Aristotle, others complete innovations .. The syllogistic rules concerning distribution are of course implied in Aristotle's account of each figure, though not enumerated separately, as common to all. 1864 Bowen Logic v. 126 The distribution of the Subject depends upon the Quantity of the Judgment. 1887 Fowler Elem. Deduct. Logic (ed. 9) iv. 34 The distribution or non-distribution of an attributive, as 'human', 'red', etc., follows that of the corresponding common term, 'human being', 'red thing', etc.

The ME. evidence favours this; but in modern use, both forms occur in nearly all parts of the country, with various differentiation of meaning. Generally, ditch is a hollow channel or deep furrow, wet or dry, but in some parts (see sense 4) it is an embankment or raised fence; usually dike or dyke is a bank or wall, but in many parts it is a wide and deep channel for running water. The existence of dich or deek in this sense in Kent, Sussex, and other southern counties, is remarkable. The use of dike, dyke, for a sea-wall or embankment in the eastern counties, may possibly have been introduced from Holland: cf. the title DIKE-GRAVE.]

[OE. had two verbs: (1) the primary strong vb. dúfan, pa. t. déaf, pl. dufon, pa. pple. dofen, intr. to duck, dive, sink; (2) the derivative causal weak vb. dýfan, dýfde, gedýfd to dip, submerge. Already in 12th c. these had begun to be confounded, the primary dūven (pa t. dēaf, dēf, pa. pple. doven) being used also trans, and the causal dȳven intrans., so that the two became synonyms, and before 1300 the strong vb. became obs., dȳven (s.w. duven, s.e. dēven, midl. and north diven) remaining, chiefly in the intrans. sense of the OE. strong vb. Of the compound bedīve, the pa. pple. BEDOVEN came down to 16th c. in Sc. Only traces of this verb are found in the cognate langs.: ON. had dýfa to dip (also in same sense deyfa); MDu. had bedūven, pa. pple. bedoven, mod.Du. bedūiven = OE. bedūfan. The s.e. deven gave the later deeve, deave, dieve; the modern dial. pa. t. dove is app. a new formation after drive, drove, or weave, wove.]

Dive (dəiv), sb. [f. DIVE v.]

1. The act of diving; a darting plunge into or through water or the like. lit. and fig.

The Amateur Swimming Association distinguishes between a dive and a plunge. The latter is defined as a standing dive made head-first from a firm take-off, free from spring. The plunger does not add any further impetus, but allows himself to progress till all forward motion ceases, when he raises his face above water. A dive may be running, from a spring-board, and with propulsion added on reaching the water.

1. Legal dissolution of marriage by a court or other competent body, or according to forms recognized in the country, nation, or tribe.

Formerly and still often (e.g. historically or anthropologically) used in the widest sense; hence, including the formal putting away of, or separation from, a spouse by a heathen or barbarian; the pronouncing a marriage to have been invalid from the beginning owing to fraud, or to legal, canonical, or physical incapacity of the parties, as in the 'divorce' of Henry VIII from Catherine (now called in English Law decree of nullity), and the 'divorce a mensa et thoro' (from bed and board), long the only 'divorce' recognized by English law, but now, since 1857, called 'judicial separation'. But, in strict legal use, now applied in English-speaking countries only to the dissolution by decree of court of what was in itself a legal marriage, upon grounds sanctioned by the law, and upon evidence accepted by the court.

Dj- is not an English combination, but is sometimes put to represent the Arabic letter ج jim, = English j (dʒ), in Arabic, Turkish, or Berber words, which have come to us through a French channel, or are spelt in imitation of French orthography; e.g. djebel, a mountain or hill, djerid or djereed, a javelin, djin, genii or familiar spirits, djubbah, an outer garment. So far as these come under the scope of this Dictionary, they will be found under J; for djowr, an infidel, see GIAOUR.

Do (dū), v. Forms and inflexions: see below. [A common WGer. strong vb. (wanting in Gothic and Norse): OE. dōn = OFris. dua, OS. dōn, duon, dōan, duan (MDu. & Du. doen, MLG. & LG. dôn, duon), OHG. tôn, tôan, tuon, tuoan, tuen (MHG. tuon, Ger. thun, tun,; Pa. t., OE. dyde, pl. dēdon, dydon = OFris. dede, pl. dēden, OS. deda, pl. dādun, dēdun (MDu. dede, Du. deed, pl. deden, MLG. & LG. dēde, pl. dēden), OHG. teta, pl. tâtum (MHG. tete, tâte, pl. tâten, Ger. that, tat, pl. thaten, taten); Pa. pple., OE. gedōn, gedēn = OFris. dēn, OS. gidōn, -dōen, -duan, ODu. dān, (MDu. gedān, Du. gedaan), OHG. (ge)tân, Ger. gethan, getan; OTeut. types dōn, deda, dōno-: dōno-, from verbal stem dō-: dō- appearing also in DEED, DOOM, -DOM), the Germanic representative of the Aryan verb stem dhē-: dhō-, to place, put, set, lay, in Skr. dhā-, OPers. dā-, Gr. θη- (pres. τίθημι, deriv. sb. θωή a penalty imposed), L. -dĕre in abdĕre to put away, condĕre to put together, dēdĕre to lay down, OSlav. děte, dějati, Lith. dėti. Lett. dêt to put, lay.

The vocalization of the Germanic vb., esp. the present stem dō- beside the Gr θη- and Slav.-Lith. dē-, has been variously explained (see e.g. Streitberg Urgerm. Gramm. 329). The pret. deda is generally held to be a reduplicated form corresponding to Skr. dadhāu: -orig. dhedhō*. The 1st p. sing. pres. indic. had originally the m of primitive verbs in mi, Skr. -mi, Gr. -μι, L. -m: viz. OE. dōm (later dō), OS. dōm (dōn), OHG. tôm, tuom (later tuon). This verb is considered by many philologists to be the source of the formative suffix of the pa. t. of weak verbs in the Germanic languages, including Norse and Gothic; in the latter the plural endings -dēdum, -dēduþ, -dēdun, are the forms which the pl. of the pret. deda would have in Gothic.

OE. deviates from the other WGer. langs. in the past dyde, for OS. deda, OHG. teta; the y is now generally explained as a special OE. representation of an Indo-germanic weak vowel. Thence the pl. dydon; the plural corresp. to OS. dādun, modG. thaten, was Anglian dēdon (also dædon, in Cædmon, etc.). In ME. dyde, dydon were represented by dude, -en (ü), midl. & north. diden, dide, now did; but dēden (with a sing. dēde derived from it like modG. that from pl. thaten) came down in some dialects to 15th c. In the pres. ind., the 2nd and 3rd pers sing. in OE had umlaut, dēst, dēð, dēst, dēð, and these forms survived in sw till the 15th c.; but ONorthumbrian had, without umlaut, dōas, dōæð, dōas, and in ME. the forms dōst, dōth (dōs) are found in north. & midl. from the 12th c. The pa. pple in OE. is known only with the prefix ge-, which in ME remained in the south as y-, i-. (Forms with ge- are found also in the pa. t., and occasionally other parts, which, however, are more properly referred to a derivative vb. OE gedōn, ME. ido, ydo). The final -n of the pple. was generally dropped in the south in ME., esp. in the forms ydo, ido, whence the ado (ədū) of modern s.w dialects.]

 To bestow, impart, grant, render, give (a thing to a person); to cause to befall or come.

Orig. with dative of the recipient or person affected, and accusative of that which is imparted or caused: e.g. 'it did him credit'. But in later use the dative is largely replaced by to and prepositional object, and then changes places with the verbal object: 'it did credit to his good sense'.

(The primary notion here appears to have been that of putting (or bestowing) something to a person, being closely related to prec. section, in which a person is put to or into something.)

4. To impart to, bring upon (a person, etc.) some affecting quality or condition; to bestow, confer, inflict; to cause by one's action (a person) to have (something). In later use, associated more closely with the notion of performance, as in 6, e.g. to do any one a service = to perform some action that is of service to him.

 To put forth (action or effort of any kind); to perform, accomplish, effect. (Now the leading trans. use.)

Since every kind of action may be viewed as a particular form of doing, the uses of the verb are as numerous as the classes of objects which it may govern. Only the general senses can here be exhibited; the phrases formed by the verb with special substantive objects, are treated under the words concerned; e.g. to do honour, the honours of: see HONOUR.

6. To perform, execute, achieve, carry out, effect, bring to pass. (With an object denoting action.) e.g. to do work, a thing, that, it, what? etc.

 As a Periphrastic Auxiliary of the present and past Indicative, and Imperative. (Formerly sometimes of the Infinitive.)

(For a detailed treatment of this, see 'Das Umschreibende Do in der Neuenglischen Prosa' by Hugo Dietze, Jena, 1895.)

As auxiliary of the Indicative (present and past).

Examples of this are found already in OE (as in MDu., O. & MLG., mod.Ger. dialects). It is more frequent in ME., but became especially frequent after 1500, first as a simple periphrastic form without perceptible difference of sense, in which use it has in the s.w. dialects practically taken the place of the simple form of the verb (e.g. I dü say for I say, he dü sim for he seems). But in standard English it is now regularly used only where, for the sake of emphasis, or of word position, it is advantageous to have the verb in two words, so that the auxiliary may receive the stress or be separated from the main verb, like the auxiliaries of the perfect and future tenses, to which the periphrastic present and past is exactly parallel in use. Thus Simple Affirmative after certain conjunctive adverbs: 'So quietly did he come that..' (like 'So quietly has he come'). Emphatic: 'He did drink', 'and drink he did' (like 'I will go', 'and go I will'). Interrogative: 'Do you hear?' (like 'Will you hear?'). Negative: 'They do not speak' (like 'They will not speak,' 'They have not spoken'.)

25. In Affirmative sentences.

a. Originally, simply periphrastic, and equivalent to the simple tense. Found in OE., frequent in ME., very frequent 1500-1700, dying out in normal prose in 18th c.; but still retained in s.w. dialects; also as an archaism in liturgical and legal use, and as a metrical resource in verse.

b. Still used, instead of the simple tense form, in those constructions in which the ordinary order of pronoun and verb is inverted; the use of the periphrastic form allowing the main verb to retain its final position as in the perfect and future.

c. Now the normal Emphatic form of the present and past Indicative.

The stress is placed upon the auxiliary, as in the perfect and future tenses. There may be inversion of order as well.

26. In Interrogative sentences.

The periphrastic form with do, did, is now the normal form. Its use allows the pronoun to be placed between the auxiliary and main verb, instead of coming after the latter: e.g. 'Did he recognize her?' instead of 'Recognized he her?'

In monosyllabic verbs, the simple form may still be used; it is always used in be and usually in have, though very recently (esp. in U. S.) we find do you have? did you have?

c 1386 CHAUCER Monk's T. 442 Fader why do ye wepe? c 1450 Cov. Myst. 196 Dude 3e hym se? 1549 LATIMER 3rd Serm. bef. Edw. VI (Arb.) 84 Did ye se any greate man? 1557 N. T. STOWE Uncle Tom's C. viii, 'Why, Sam, what do you mean?' said Mrs. Shelby, breathless.

27. In Negative sentences.

The periphrasis with do, did, is now the normal form with not. Its use allows the negative to come after the auxiliary, instead of following the principal verb: e.g. 'We did not recognize him' instead of 'We recognized him not'.

The introduction of the periphrastic do not, did not, was connected with the obsolescence of the earlier usage which placed the negative particle first, 'we ne sungen'.

The simple form is still retained with be, have ('do', 'did not have', is colloquial and recent, chiefly in U.S.), and is frequent with monosyllabic words as dare, need; with other verbs it is always possible, and not being the ordinary form has an impressive rhetorical effect.

c 1489 CAXTON Sonnes of Aymon xxii. 472 It is to late to repente me that I dyde not doo. c 1489 — Blanchardyn xli. 153 Whan ye dyde not knowe hym. 1564 GRINDAL Rem. (1843) 22, I do not doubt but that God revealed .. other parts. 1664 EVELYN *Kal. FISKE War of Independence 139 The popular histories do not have [= have not] much to say about these eighteen days. Mod. We do not know.

28. In Negative Interrogative sentences.

Now the normal form, as in 26 and 27.

Nts.* I. 85 Dost thou not believe that I was in it?

29. In colloquial speech do not (senses 27, 28), is usually contracted to don't (dōunt), does not to doesn't (vulgar don't from do not 3rd sing.: see A 2 c. γ), did not to didn't. The dialectal forms are numerous: Sc. dinna, disna, didna, north. Eng. dunno, dunnot.

30. As auxiliary of the Imperative.

a. In the Imperative positive, adding force to entreaty, exhortation, or command (this usually with the pronoun inserted as 'do you go at once!'); in early times, down to c 1600, it was sometimes merely periphrastic.

The main verb is in OE. found both in the Infinitive (α) and the Imperative (β); the Imperative is usual in early ME.; in later use (γ) the forms are indistinguishable, but it is usually viewed as Infinitive, as in 25.

d. In the Imperative negative, do not, colloq. contracted don't (dōunt), is now the normal form.

†31. As auxiliary of other parts of the verb. The 16th c. Scottish poets extended the periphrastic use to the infinitive and pples.: thus, to do incres = to increase, done discus = discussed, doand proclame = proclaiming. Traces of this occur elsewhere.

They were looked upon by members of the two extreme parties as speculative politicians holding a 'doctrine' not within the range of practical politics.

There is at Paris a small set of speculative politicians called doctrinaires. 1834 Spectator 15 Nov. 1086/2 Do not be cajoled by any stupid stories..about the Doctrinaires going out of office on any question of principle. 1848 W. Mag.* Jan. 179/1 The same public which despises doctrinairism in politics, is just as decided and united in despising everything but doctrinairism in religion.

In later use there has been unintelligent association with DODDER sb., and perhaps with DODDER v., and its cognates. It is doubtful whether senses 2 and 3 belong originally to this word.]

1. A word conventionally used (? after Dryden) as an attribute of old oaks (rarely other trees); app. originally meaning: Having lost the top or branches, esp. through age and decay; hence, remaining as a decayed stump. Johnson explained it as 'Overgrown with dodder; covered with supercrescent plants'; and this explanation, which was manifestly erroneous, since neither dodder nor any plant like it grows upon trees, has been repeated in the dictionaries, and has influenced literary usage, in which there is often a vague notion of some kind of parasitical accretion accompanying or causing decay.

Dog-days, sb. pl. [tr. L. dies caniculares: see Canicular.]

1. The days about the time of the heliacal rising of the Dog-star; noted from ancient times as the hottest and most unwholesome period of the year.

They have been variously calculated, as depending on the greater dog-star (Sirius) or the lesser dog-star (Procyon); on the helical, or (by some in modern times) the cosmical rising of either of these (both of which also differ in different latitudes); and as preceding, following, or both preceding and following, one of these epochs; and their duration has been variously reckoned at from 30 to 54 days. In the latitude of Greenwich, the cosmical rising of Procyon now takes place about July 27, that of Sirius about Aug. 11; in Mediterranean latitudes, the former is somewhat later, the latter earlier. The heliacal rising is some days later than the cosmical; and all the phenomena now take place later in the year than in ancient times, owing to the precession of the equinoxes. Thus very different dates have been assigned for the dog-days, their beginning ranging from July 3 to Aug. 15. In current almanacs they are said to begin July 3 and end Aug. 11 (i. e. to be the 40 days preceding the cosmical rising of Sirius).

The name (Gr. ἡμέραι κυνάδες, Lat. dies caniculares) arose from the pernicious qualities of the season being attributed to the 'influence' of the Dog-star; but it has long been popularly associated with the belief that at this season dogs are most apt to run mad; see Canicular 1, quot. 1601.

The dōl, dole form survived in English till the 16th c., and its normal representative in modern English is dool; but the word became to a great extent obsolete by 1600, and some of its modern revivers have preferred the ME. spelling dole. It has always been retained in Sc., where it is now regularly dōl, dūl, variously spelt dool, duil, dule; dule also occurred in English from 14th to 16th c., and is used in preference to dole or dool by some modern poets. In addition to these derivatives from OF., the forms duyel, dueyl, deuel, dueil, imitating later French types, occur from Caxton onwards.]

Dolmen (dǫ·lmen). [a. mod. F. dolmen (dolmin Latour d'Auvergne, 1796, dolmine Le Grand d'Aussy 1798, dolmen, Mémoires de l'Académie Celtique 1807).

Given by Legonidec 1821 as Breton = 'monument in form of an altar or table'; and usually explained as f. Breton tôl = taol, L. tabula, table + mean, men stone. But the Breton compound of these words would be taolvean or tôlven, and the d and m of dolmen are not thus satisfactorily accounted for. Borlase, Antiq. Cornwall (1754) called these structures cromlêh, but gave tolmên, lit. 'hole of stone', as the current Cornish name for those enormous blocks found in Cornwall and Scilly naturally poised upon two supporting points, so as to leave a 'hole' or aperture beneath, through which a man or beast may pass. There is reason to think that this is the word inexactly reproduced by Latour d'Auvergne as dolmen, and misapplied by him and succeeding French archæologists to the cromlech.]

The French name, used by some English authors, for a Cromlech, a prehistoric structure, consisting of a large flattish stone supported upon two or more smaller upright stones.
